

MSEC 2006 TOBIAS

imagine for a moment... most of you are sitting in chairs, imagine if your chair only had three legs instead of four. what happens? well, you learn to adapt and adjust.

you learn how to sit in just such a way that you don't turn over. your muscles in your body compensate and the mechanisms of your mind go into their mode to make sure you are positioning yourself in just the right way.

and after a while you forget that there ever was a fourth leg. you now are working in a reality that is three-legged, but yet there is always that underlying, nagging feeling that there's something missing. but you've compensated for that missing piece so well, you've ignored it or pretended it wasn't there, that now your reality is three-legged.
